

As a newborn, Penny Bunton spent only five weeks with her biological mother before being put up for adoption. In this moving and humorous memoir about growing up as an adopted child, Bunton recounts the struggles of living in a dysfunctional family, of feeling like the odd one out, and the endless desire to “belong.” Bunton’s middle-class English parents, already in their forties when they adopted her, were in a strained marriage plagued by secrets and betrayal. With humour and compassion, Bunton examines the domestic civil wars that ultimately led to their divorce, exploring the journeys and motivations of the most important people in her life. Along the way, she explores the ways in which her own character traits or coping mechanisms may have contributed to her sense of estrangement. Penny’s ultimate desire was to feel a firm sense of her own identity—and as she searched for her biological mother, immersing herself in the past, the answers she found transformed her life. “Intimate and wonderfully written. Wept with joy and sadness while on this emotional roller-coaster.” Laura Wilder “I didn’t want the story to end. The book left me on that Canadian island, meditating on my own family history, about not having talked to any of my cousins, uncles, or aunts for more than twenty-five years and thinking, how has my family history shaped me?” Angel Garcia
